

When Evil

RUNS OUT OF STORIES

An ending where love and justice are not in tension because both are completely vindicated.

When people think about the end of human history, they usually picture destruction, punishment, or a senseless collapse. Scripture, however, presents something far more serious and far more human: a process in which evil doesn't simply end, but is completely exposed. This isn't God forcibly erasing the problem and moving on. It's the entire universe coming to understand why suffering existed in the first place, and why it will never happen again.

01 The millennium points precisely to that a period with no more deception, no more manipulation, no more propaganda for evil.

What remains is silence, review, and truth. To many skeptics, the idea of judgment sounds primitive or vindictive, as if God needed to punish in order to feel satisfied.

But Scripture moves in a different direction entirely: judgment doesn't exist to inform God He already knows everything but so that no one has to spend eternity with lingering doubts about His justice.

The deepest question behind human suffering isn't "why did this happen?" it's "could it happen again?" The millennium answers that clearly: no. Evil is not eternal, not necessary, not part of the original design. It is a parenthesis that will be closed with full transparency.

03 During that period, history is reviewed without rush, without fear, and without spin.

Every decision is laid open, every consequence is understood, and every created being is able to see that God did not act out of arbitrariness or raw power, but with justice and with genuine respect even for those who rejected Him.

That breaks entirely with the image of an authoritarian God, and replaces it with something far more unsettling and profound: a God who allows Himself to be examined.

A God who doesn't govern by withholding information He opens the books. A God who doesn't need everyone to forget in order to keep the peace, but who relies on the truth.

That's why the end of the millennium is not a tragedy it's a final liberation. Evil disappears not as a suppressed enemy, but as an exposed lie.

And once that happens, there is nothing left that could ever resurrect the pain. The eternity that follows isn't held together by the fear that it might all happen again. It's grounded in the certainty that the universe is, at last, a safe place.

That is the hope Scripture offers: not a rushed ending, but a just one. Not a victory imposed, but one that is fully understood. An ending where love and justice are not in tension because both are completely vindicated.
